Whereas the United States is a Pacific country with ties that span over 150 years and shared values and interests with the Pacific Islands, including through the Compacts of

Free Association with the Freely Associated States, the Republic of the Marshall Islands, the Federated States of Micronesia, and the Republic of Palau;

Whereas the United States and Pacific Island nations are bound by shared interests and values, including—

- (4) advancing economic prosperity free from coercion through trade and sustainable development; and
- (5) supporting democracy, good governance, the rule of law and human rights, and fundamental freedoms;

Whereas the United States exports over $400,000,000 in goods to Pacific Island countries, and two-way trade between the United States and Pacific Island countries amounts to nearly $832,000,000 in a year;

Whereas the United States launched the Small and Less Populous Island Economies Initiative in March 2021 to strengthen United States collaboration with island countries and territories, including in the Pacific Islands, on COVID–19 economic challenges, long-term economic development, climate change, and other shared interests;

Whereas successive United States administrations have recognized the importance of the Pacific region, including the Pacific Islands, in high-level strategic documents, including—

- (1) the 2015 National Security Strategy;
- (2) the 2017 National Security Strategy;

(3) the 2019 Indo-Pacific Strategy Report, which identified the Pacific Islands as “critical to U.S. strategy because of our shared values, interests and commitments”; and

(4) the 2022 Indo-Pacific Strategy, which stated that the United States will “seek to be an indispensable partner to Pacific Island nations”;

Whereas the United States has deepened its diplomatic engagement with the Pacific Islands through several recent initiatives, including the Pacific Pledge that provided an additional $100,000,000 in 2019 and $200,000,000 in 2020, on top of the approximately $350,000,000 that the United States provides annually to the region to support shared priorities in economic and human development, climate change, and more; and
